What was radical in conceptual art, and what, I am thankful to say, has not yet been lost sight of, was the work it required – beyond the object – of recognizing, intervening within, realigning, reorganizing, these networks of differences in which the very definition of “art” and what it represents is constituted: the glimpse it allowed us of the possibility of the absence of “presence”, and thus the possibility of change.

The Absence of Presence - Victor Burgin | ART THEORY

Following Ruskin, Fuller claims that art is a channel for grace, evoking a spiritual response in us. He argues that this conception underlies the best modern British painting.
